THE LIBRARY OF CONGRESS, PERIODICAL DIVISION, WASHINGTON, D.C.

EICHMANN IS DESCRIBED BY BERLIN PASTOR, ONE OF 700 CLERGY AT DACHAU CAMP, AS OBSESSED WITH COLD REJECTION OF JEWS; LIKE ICE, DEVOID OF FEELINGS; WITH NO SPARK OF HUMANITY; FULL OF RABID, BOUNDLESS HATRED; OBLIVIOUS TO DEMANDS OF JUSTICE AND CONSCIENCE; IMPERVIOUS TO HIS PLEAS FOR CLEMENCY TOWARD JEWS

During the trial of Adolf Eichmann, in Jerusalem, a German pastor testified that Adolf Eichmann harbored a demonic hatred of Jews and was quite impervious to pleas for clemency. The witness, whose teeth had been knocked out by the Nazis at the Sachsenhausen concentration camp, looked across the courtroom to the prisoner and spat out the word, "landsknecht." It means mercenary, a soldier without conscience.

The witness, the Rev. Dr. Heinrich Karl Ernst Grueber, dean of St. Mary's Evangelical Cathedral, of Berlin, said Eichmann's "rabid, boundless hatred" had puzzled him deeply, says the New York Times. Later, the witness said, he realized that Eichmann was obsessed, not with a burning hatred of Jews, but with a cold rejection of them, an utter lack of feeling about their fate.

Dean Grueber ended his testimony with a plea that the Eichmann trial increase understanding between Israel and Germany and with a prayer that everyone, including the defendant, would "find forgiveness before God's throne."

Dean Grueber was the first German witness to take the stand. A ponderous man, with thinning white hair and eyes that squint behind thick-lens glasses, the witness tonight with visible anguish to give a rational explanation for the phenomenon of attempted genocide in the Twentieth Century.

Holding his cupped hands before him as if he were trying to weigh good and evil, Dean Grueber told how he and other clergymen interned at Sachsenhausen had pondered the reasons for the Nazi insanity in Germany.

"We could not find an answer," Dean Grueber said. "We saw it as a psychological problem, because after all, it was impossible that one could perpetrate crimes with such sadism, so much cruelty."

Dean Grueber stood up well under cross-examination. The audience broke into sympathetic laughter and applause in two demonstrations that were promptly squelched by the presiding judge, Justice Moshe Landau.

The witness said he had made several visits to Eichmann's office before he was sent to Sachsenhausen December 18, 1940. He said that in trying to intervene on behalf of persecuted Jews, he sometimes saw Eichmann and sometimes was received by an aide. But, he testified, he never once won even a slight concession.

"What was Eichmann's attitude?" asked Yaacov Baror, assistant prosecutor.

Dean Grueber spread his huge hands, squinted at the prisoner and said: "He made the impression — I hope the prisoner will not take it amiss — of being a block of ice, or a slab of marble, completely devoid of human feeling. He was a landsknecht."

Dean Grueber said he never got from Eichmann an affirmative reply to a request, writes Homer Bigart, in the New York Times. "We would either get a definite 'No' or a noncommittal answer with an injunction to wait," he asserted.

The prosecutor asked whether Eichmann had ever mentioned orders from above. Eichmann's main defense is the contention that he was only a Gestapo officer who was obliged to carry out superiors' orders and that consequently he had no responsibility for the murder of 6,000,000 Jews as charged in the indictment.

"He would answer in the first person," said the dean. "It was always 'I order' or 'I say this' — I do not recall his ever saying that he had to refer something to a higher authority."

Under cross-examination by the defense counsel, Dr. Robert Servatius, of West Germany, Dean Grueber denied that it was impossible for a landsknecht to say "I order" instead of giving a subordinate's usual reply, "I am acting according to instructions."

"I do not think that this type of landsknecht ceases to be a landsknecht even if he rises in rank, even if he reaches the highest rank in the hierarchy," retorted the dean, his face glowing. Dr. Servatius was unhappy with the dean's rather lengthy replies.

"An interesting psychological theory," he commented with sarcasm. "But my question was unanswered."

Dr. Grueber drew laughter and a brief forbidden handclap when he suggested that the defense counsel clarify his questions because "I am an old man, not a good hunting dog, and I do not find the scent easily."

Dr. Servatius dropped this line of questioning and challenged the dean on his "block of ice" description of Eichmann. If he had found Eichmann so cold, Dr. Servatius asked, why had not the dean tried to warm him up with some moral preachment?

Dean Grueber said preaching would no more have penetrated Eichmann's brain, than "water on a poodle." He recalled that one day he had arrived tired at Eichmann's office in Kurfuerstenstrasse and that somehow "the accused had had a good day and perhaps a day of goodwill."

Dean Grueber said he had heard rumors that Eichmann had been brought up in a Templar's settlement in Palestine, says the New York Times. So he asked if Eichmann knew the road from Jerusalem to Jericho. Eichmann, who had spent only a few hours on Palestine soil before he was brought to Israel as a prisoner last May, nodded. The pastor went on:

"On that road there was once a Jew felled by robbers. And the man who helped that Jew was a non-Jew. The God whom I worship tells me, 'Go and do thou likewise.'"

"That answer will do," said Dr. Servatius wearily.

After the luncheon recess, the defense attorney read long excerpts from an Evangelical Church paper of the Nineteen Thirties hailing Hitler's anti-Jewish measures.

"Would not Eichmann, reading this in a church paper be convinced he was on the right path?" Dr. Servatius inquired. "I did not know that the accused drew his moral maxims from the Berlin evangelistic paper," said the dean acidly.

There was another handicap amid laughter. Justice Landau sent policemen running to the offending aisle, but no culprit was found.

Dr. Servatius, the nape of his neck turning crimson, tried again. He asked whether the dean had read "The Third Reich And Its Thinkers," which, he said, had quoted scholars, professors, and men of liberal professions as having said Hitler was "acting properly and correctly."

If these learned men could be misled, Dr. Servatius suggested, certainly a smaller man, a man like Adolf Eichmann, would be tripped up by Hitler.

Dean Grueber replied calmly that academic status offered no defense against succumbing to Hitlerism. It was rather the possession of good sense, he said.

"I can say that in the Third Reich I found small men in lowly positions who had this healthy sense," he said.

Dean Grueber recalled that during the first deportation of Jews from Stettin in 1940 the commanding general was appalled at the resulting misery and sent an aide to the dean's office urging him to "do something."

"I could not resist telling the aide that if I had been the general commanding Stettin, not a single railway car would have left for the East with Jews," Dean Grueber said.

The dean said that at that time he was beginning to be regarded as a pest by the Gestapo, says the New York Times. He was warned that his activities were running counter to the national interest, but, he said, he replied defiantly that he would continue to help the Jews. He was getting clandestine assistance from various officials, he testified.

Two Gestapo officers, he said, used to bellow "swine" at him in the corridors and then, in the confines of their office, show him impending orders so he could alert Jews. One of these, he said, was Vom Rath, father of the third secretary of the German Embassy in Paris, who was assassinated by Herschel Grynszpan.

He said Vom Rath had got into the secret police because high Gestapo officials reasoned that the killing of his son would make him a trusted hater of Jews. "But this was not the case," said the dean. "For this man helped us secretly on many occasions."

Dean Grueber caused some surprise when he asked permission to withhold the name of the other helpful Gestapo agent. The Israeli tribunal was clearly puzzled. Judge Benjamin Halevi finally demanded to know why anyone in West Germany should now be embarrassed by the exposure of wartime decency to Jews.

Dean Grueber replied that the publicity would only draw "slander and threats" to the person involved. He said he had "a whole file of abusive letters" he had received when the news that he would go to Israel to testify against Eichmann was published in West Germany.

Dean Grueber, describing his treatment at Sachsenhausen, testified: "My teeth were knocked out and I suffered a heart attack, but this was a fraction of what my Jewish friends suffered."

The pastor recalled a cold night when drunken S.S. men ordered Jews out of their huts dressed only in nightshirts and forced them to roll in the snow, says the New York Times. Some of the Jews died of pneumonia, he said.

A woman in the gallery sobbed loudly as the dean called Sachsenhausen "worse than Dante's Inferno because in this particular hell no one could complain, no one could weep."

"If a man was shot and killed," he said, "it was nothing, but if a spade was missing a report had to be made."

Asked about medical experiments at Dachau, in Upper Bavaria, where he was later transferred, Dean Grueber said many of his friends were used as guinea pigs. They were given air-bubble injections, infected with disease, or put under a glass bell and subjected to air pressures, he said.

Another witness, Mrs. Charlotte Salzberger, a native of Frankfurt who now lives in Israel, said Eichmann warned her in March, 1945, against disclosing what she had learned about Nazi death camps in the East.

Mrs. Salzberger said that she and five other women were summoned into Eichmann's presence at Theresienstadt, the show place concentration camp in what is now Czechoslovakia, says the New York Times. The women had recently been transferred from Ravensbrueck, Germany.

In Eichmann's eyes were surprise and interest and perhaps even acceptance, says the New York Herald Tribune, as the strong-visaged clergyman intoned to the tribunal judges and then, swinging his head toward Eichmann, to the defendant:

"I beg to be understood if what I have said has been said a little strictly and if I have spoken out here openly. I hope that this love and this forgiveness will encompass everybody, everywhere, including the accused. And that there will be loving forgiveness before the throne of God."

The sixty-nine-year-old clergyman, whose teeth were beaten out of his head in one of the three concentration camps into which he had been thrown for helping the German Jews, did most certainly speak openly against Eichmann and his Nazi collaborators, but his words of charity, coming at the end of a short address he had made to the judges, were taken by all in the court in a spirit of impressive solemnity.

For this man, Dr. Heinrich Karl Ernst Grueber, dean of the Evangelical Grossen Maria Cathedral of West Berlin, was an imposing figure. He gave his testimony fearlessly, even though he was threatened in West Germany for making the trip to Israel.

He was a rock of Gibraltar sitting there in the witness stand in neat, clerical black. He has a broad, generous mouth that looks like it could take an SS (Nazi Elite Guard) club squarely on the teeth without flinching.

Dean Grueber related the story of how he and a number of Christian co-workers around Germany were openly doing an organized work of trying to help the Jews escape from the Nazi persecution, says the New York Herald Tribune.

He told in detail of the organization he had set up in Berlin in co-operation with Jewish leaders there, and how this brought him into frequent contact with Eichmann, the expert on the Jews, whose office was in Berlin.

During a stiff cross-examination by Dr. Robert Servatius, the defense counsel, the dean admitted he had not appealed in so many words to Eichmann's feelings in those days.

"I always maintained that deeds are much more effective than words," he explained, "and if the accused did not come to the right way of thinking after I had attempted to help people, I believed that words would have been useless."

Dean Grueber's characterization of Eichmann, though searing in its failure to detect a spark of humanity in the man, nevertheless was offered by the witness with charity.

"The impression he made on me — and I hope the accused will not take it amiss if I say so — I didn't come here out of hatred or guided by feelings of vengeance— the impression he made on me was that of a block of ice or marble, completely devoid of human feelings," the clergyman testified.

"He was a landsknecht (mercenary), as it were. In our eyes there is a difference between a landsknecht and a soldier. A landsknecht, the moment he puts on his uniform, becomes oblivious to the demands of justice and his own conscience."

Dean Grueber said that later, in a concentration camp, he came to see this in action all around him, and he also came to understand it. But he never quite explained just how it was he came to see into the Eichmann type of mind, though he did say that he wrote a tract on the subject once, reports Robert S. Bird, in the New York Herald Tribune. He continued:

"At that time we couldn't understand how a human being, how Eichmann and his ilk could possibly behave the way they did. We saw in them a psychological problem, because after all it is quite impossible that one could perpetrate crimes with so much sadism, so much cruelty."

The witness said that it became a major problem for him and his associates, and the Jews he was

On Sabbath nights, in many Jewish homes in Canada, a decanter of Mazel Tov wine finds its place on the starched tablecloth, right beside the challah.

Mazel Tov is a wine with a taste you'll 'remember', a ruby red, richly sweet 'kiddush' wine made of Concord grapes grown in the vineyards of the Niagara Peninsula.

Mazel Tov made 'Kosher l'Pesach' under strict rabbinical supervision, is available throughout the year, for every "simcha".

My Life Among The Gentiles

For almost a decade now, I have taught school in a small Eastern city. During most of this time, I have been the only Jewish member of the faculty. There have been a few others who came in for short periods, but they never actually became an integral part of the educational set-up. I have had my share of ups and downs with the faculty members, students, and other personnel but, for the most part, I feel that I am a part of the world I live in, not segregated or tolerated, but a real part of my own little society.

I grew up in this little city, one member of the twenty Jewish families in a population of about 25,000. I grew up here, went to school here, and then went away to college. I say "away" but, actually, I only commuted ten miles to this institution of higher learning. It was here that I was to learn the real meaning of bias.

I had dreamt of going to college; in my mind, I had created a movielike atmosphere of good fellowship. With an Anglican name and a non-stereotyped face, I was readily accepted. For about a month, I was rushed by the most desirable sorority on the campus — the most influential gentile group. Then they found out the "truth" about me. To their credit, they were at least sheepish as they withdrew the hand of sisterhood, explaining the rigidity and the holiness of their bylaws. They invited me to feel free to come to the house any time: I would always be a welcome guest. There was a certain amount of irony in their honesty: they never considered for an instant that I did not "understand." My situation wasn't unusual — only my naivoté.

There were others like me, some in even worse situations. There were the Jewish boys, taken by twos or threes in a sort of quota arrangement, into the largest fraternity on the campus. Happy over their acceptance, they soon found themselves ostracized by the remainder of the Jews on the campus.

There was one lad, a convert to Christian Science, who spent his four years pointing out his non-Jewishness, only to be identified constantly by his fraternity brothers as their "Jewish member," an evidence of their broad-mindedness. There was another girl from my home town, a devout Catholic, whose father was Jewish. The Catholic sororities considered her a Jew, the Jewish sororities a Catholic, and so she remained in a limbo of loneliness.

It was then that I began to wage my own little battle, tilting windmills, trying to defeat an attitude I did not understand. I deliberately snared myself a few gentile beaux, so that I could attend dances that would otherwise have been inaccessible to me. I took pleasure in "crossing the color line", as it were, somehow feeling

CLASS IN COOKERY

PINEAPPLE FEATHER CAKE

one and one-half cups cake flour six eggs
one and one-half cups sugar
one teaspoon lemon juice
one teaspoon baking powder
one-quarter teaspoon salt
one-half cup pineapple juice

Sift together flour and baking powder four times. Beat egg whites and salt until stiff but not dry. Add three-quarters cup sugar, about two tablespoons at a time. Beat well after each addition. Beat egg yolks and remaining sugar and fruit juices and beat until thick enough to hold a soft peak. Fold flour, about one-quarter of it at a time, into yolk mixture, just enough to moisten flour. Fold in egg white mixture. Pour into an ungreased tube pan. Cut through batter with a spatula to remove large air bubbles. Bake in a slow oven of 325 degrees for fifty to sixty minutes. Invert pan and let cake remain in pan until cool. Makes one nine-inch cake.

Mrs. Eva Annett.
7745 Querbes Avenue, Montreal.

CHOCOLATE FUDGE CAKE

one-quarter cup of butter
two cups sugar
one and one-quarter cups hot water
two eggs
one-quarter cup shortening one-half cup cocoa two cups sifted flour
two teaspoons baking powder

Cream butter, shortening and sugar. Mix cocoa with hot water. Add sifted flour and cocoa mixture alternately. Put this mixture in the refrigerator over night. Next day, add eggs, and baking powder. Bake in greased, nine-inch square pan, at 350 degrees for forty-five minutes to one hour. Don't remove from pan.

a sweetness in the fact that my presence was annoying to some.

I proudly attended the St. Patrick's Day dance with the President of the Newman Club. I was one of the court at a regal campus crowning of a fraternity that preferred to disband rather than accept a few college regulations broadening the admission policy toward rushees. To this day, I am not sure what I was proving other than my acceptability as a human being. The time came when I was convinced that the activities on one side of the fence were identical with activities on the other. Then, I was more than content to go back to "my own." (This expression is not mine.)

Getting a teaching job a decade ago was not an easy task. I was turned down in little towns that God had forgotten when they found I was not also qualified to teach Sunday School. Jewish students changed their names, covered up telltale affiliations answered personnel questions vaguely, all in an attempt to be placed in a job. After a half dozen unsuccessful interviews, my supervisor, who had given me glowing recommendations as a practice teacher, suggested tactfully that I might enjoy working in a department store.

It was in my home town that I got a job. I was qualified; I was competent; they needed teachers; but I received my appointment through political influence. Our city was run by a hardy old politician who liked my dad. He had promised to see that I was placed as soon as I finished college. I am idealistic enough to wish it hadn't had to happen this way but I am honest enough to admit that it did. There is irony in the fact that I have lived long enough to see jobs begging for teachers, not teachers begging for jobs.

Teaching has been a series of learning experiences for me. I have had to cope with situations that we all, Jew and gentile, have to face. I have learned not to jump a foot when someone tactlessly mentions "jewing" someone down. I don't let it pass, but I am no longer emotionally scarred. I believe people deserve to be embarrassed by their ignorance. Recently, a salesman was trying to sell us a projector. This happened to be very expensive. I told him that I would like to have it but that I didn't think I could persuade the Board to spend the money.

"Just be like the Jewish merchants," he said. "They can always cry to make a sale."

The two other teachers standing with me were obviously embarrassed. I was determined to be calm and see how well he could extricate his foot from his mouth. "Since I'm the only Jew here," I said, "I suppose I'm qualified. But since you're the salesman, you go to the Board yourself. Perhaps you can develop your own technique."

With that I left. He came in to apologize and to tell me that he hoped his "slip" hadn't changed my decision. "After all," he said, "I didn't know you were Jewish."

"No, you didn't. Possibly you should check these matters. I don't know what you are, either, and I couldn't care less."

He hovered about me for a while and then left. I hope he learned to curb his so-called "pleasantries"; I really have little sympathy for "his kind."

As a history teacher, I have brought details to my classes that others couldn't give them. They may have been sickened by my stories, but they learned about the pogroms of Czarist Russia, about the Inquisition, about the Nazi Terror. They heard that even Isabella, the patron of Columbus, was a backer of Spain's Inquisition. They may have been squeamish but I am sure information does no one any lasting harm.

There were times that I wished that I were someone else somewhere else. When I first started, World War II was in progress. I remember one class discussion on rationing when one of my students informed me that the responsibility for all our inconvenience rested with "the Jew merchants who want to drive up prices." I am not sure that my explanation changed his mind but, at least, I was there to administer a little antitoxin.

I also heard the "Maybe Hitler was right" statement from some of my students, and I had no compunction in asking these few, "How would you like my skin for your lamp-shade?" Shocking statement to make to a child, but sometimes shock is acceptable therapy.

Christmas would inevitably bring some attack on the few Jewish children who sat alone in the group. "Do you know that Myra has never had a Christmas tree?", "Did you know that Sam doesn't believe in Christ?" and the classic. "Did you know that the Jews killed Christ?" The lone child would try helplessly to answer the charges hurled against him, and it was then that I would explain that I, their teacher, was just like Sam and Myra, and so, for that matter, was Jesus Christ. I also would explain that their own intolerance was defiling the very spirit of the holiday they were celebrating.

At first, I was most sensitive to insults to "my own" but, as time passed, I became acutely attuned to the jibes at others. Words like "Wop" and "Polack" were taboo in my classroom; and snide remarks about "dumb Frenchies" and "dirty Hunkies" would draw more ire than profanity or other infractions of procedure.

With children there can be anger but, with adults, the situation changes. Strong emotion is not always practicable with people one must face day after day. There are times, however, when it is unavoidable. I remember one day, at luncheon, a group of us were discussing a little boy who was a discipline problem. He was of Italian descent. We tried to analyze his particular situation, each offering suggestions.

Finally, one teacher said, "You know that these Italians are all hot-tempered. What can you expect?" She totally ignored the fact that seated across from her was another teacher, also of Italian descent, one of the sweetest and most stable people in the world.

She plunged ahead heedlessly. "After all, certain groups have certain characteristics, don't you think?" The last remark was directed just as stupidly to me. She herself was half Jewish and half Irish in background, proud of the latter and reticent about the former.

"I really don't see any connection between geography and disposition," I answered.

"Well, look at me! I have a real Irish temper."

"Well, no one could accuse you of having a real Jewish head." She laughed, too, but not too heartily. We're still friends, I guess, as good friends as we could ever be.

My pupils always have the best Christmas parties, possibly because of my defensive attitude, possibly because I love parties and fun. I know all about the separation of church and state but in a poor town, where these are the only festivities that the children have, I am not sure that I would accomplish anything by an adamant stand. It is always their party—my gentile charges' party, not mine. Perhaps I have guilt in my heart, I don't know. I would like to ask Leonard Bernstein if he feels any the less a Jew when he gives a Christmas concert. Would the situation be affected in any way if he didn't? I don't know.

Despite the objections of many to Christmas celebrations in public schools, I am sure that they will continue. Children are sometimes keener than we, and I remember with a smile one class that gave me a Christmas gift with a "Happy Chanukah" greeting. Incidentally, they used Christmas wrappings. Of course, they had the whole situation topsy-turvy; of course, they didn't understand the meaning of Chanukah, but they did accept the fact that their teacher did not celebrate Christmas. As a teacher, I was pleased at their learning that much.

I am not a clergyman, I am not a legal expert, I am a teacher, and I know that learning is a long, slow, arduous process, never-ending. I also know that learning is the only final solution to all these problems, despite theory and enforced legislation.

I have many Jewish friends who have moved from metropolitan areas into totally Catholic or totally Protestant areas. In both cases, they have found intolerance and have blamed it, in toto, on the group that surrounds them. In my years of living, I have found very little difference between an intolerant Catholic and an intolerant Protestant. Perhaps, the only one is the fact that a Catholic may engage in a heated argument with you, while a Protestant will not deign to do so. The tolerant Catholic, on the other hand, is far more emotional, because his are usually the lessons of personal experience.

The intolerant Jew is the hardest to take, because he is the most stupid of the stupid. He has had the hardest lessons and learned the least. As I move from Jewish group to gentile group, I find that I cannot be completely a chameleon and accept all of the diatribe that I hear. I am uncomfortable defending one group against another. It is not my personal responsibility, but yet I cannot walk away from misguided opinion. The voices of common sense are too often drowned out by the senseless and the violently vocal.

In more recent years, I have taught English, and the children, in their compositions, often hold up a mirror of my opinion. They tell me, that though Caesar was mighty, he was an enemy of the people because he played upon their emotions, he robbed them of initiative, and he used them for his own purposes. I read their reasons for Silas Marner being a victim of intolerance, and their analysis of the type of mind that breeds intolerance. I am not impartial in my teaching. If a teacher sees the right, she cannot ignore it; if she sees a wrong, she cannot defend it.

I have been naive. I remember arguing that children could read anything in high school. I remember my own teacher and The Merchant of Venice. Shylock was a very human character, a man who had been badgered beyond all endurance; who, when he gave way to the ways of his enemies, lost everything. I did not realize the harm that could be done until I inherited the class of a teacher who had done a little different interpreting.

This group told me about the funny story "where the old Jew got what he deserved." Their indoctrination was like a page from Mein Kampf. I was shocked at the attitude of the children, who knew so few Jews, and even more shocked at their teacher, who, I presume, was an intelligent woman.

When driving in heavy traffic during cool weather, a window in the car should be opened sufficiently to let in fresh air. When cars move slowly and are close together with frequent stops, the exhaust of the car ahead may send fumes into the intake of the car behind. Shutting off the heater for awhile under such conditions will help to prevent carbon monoxide poisoning.

MY LIFE AMONG THE GENTILES

an. The idea that the educated can also be small-minded is always hard to accept. It is a contradiction for anyone brought up in the Jewish tradition of respect for a teacher.

At this I remember one of my college teachers, a Ph.D. with a major in sociology. He often remarked that he knew that he was biased but that he could do nothing about it. He would address any nun or priest in his class as "Miss" or "Mister." He often remarked that he couldn't stand to give those "pushy little Jews" high grades. We wondered how many he downgraded. Once, when asked a question about slavery, he answered that he didn't think "niggers were worth discussing."

I have colleagues like this, although not so outspoken. They say little, they commit no overt act, but the feeling is there. They are negative, doing their damage quietly. These people are unforgivable — because they attack children. I have a colleague who runs the school magazine. In her charge are some of the creative Jewish talents in the school; invariably, these children are appointed to the advertising or business staff because they are so good at "that sort of thing." I have another colleague who asks me each year if I get paid for the Jewish holidays. (I do!) She has yet to offer me the felicitations of the season. There are others who regard me as a sort of misguided heathen, and I take pleasure in reminding them that Jesus was one of "us."

My worst moment came with a boy named Jimmy. He and I didn't hit it off from the beginning. I couldn't understand why his other teachers spoke so well of him. I couldn't fathom his dislike until one day I said something to him, and he looked at me and muttered, "Dirty Jew." I was too shocked to say anything. I kept him in my class and neither of us mentioned the incident. At examination time, I asked one of the other teachers to grade his paper. I informed him of the procedure when I gave him his grade, which was passing.

The next day, he brought me a box of candy. Neither of us said a word. I don't know why he felt as he did; I don't know that I changed him in the least; I don't think I did. I failed, and I worry because I didn't have the know-how to teach in a situation that demanded all the skill I could muster. All I remember was the unreasonable hatred in his eyes as he stared at me.

But there are better things that I remember, also. There are the students and faculty members who send me Rosh Hashonah greetings; the teachers and neighbors who give my children Chanukah gifts and who send our family wine at Passover. There are those who return my greeting of "Sholem" with another "Sholem," and there are those whom I have taught to say "l'chaim" with their cocktail.

And I have learned that on St. Patrick's Day, when an Irish-American friend chants, "The top of the morning to you," the proper response is "And the rest of the day to you." Why not? To teach is to learn.

Last year, when there was the upsurge of Nazi smearings, my heart was heavy. I felt that no one around me could possibly understand. One morning, as we rose to salute the flag and say the morning prayer, my principal, who leads the whole ceremony over the public address system, began by saying, "And as we pray, Christians and Jews, let us pray for a world where every man may live in dignity and safety, a world where those indoctrinated with hate, will never control our lives." She was saying the prayer that was in my troubled heart. Later, I thanked her and she laughed. "You know this is my world, too," she said.

Eban Calls For Basic Change In Aid For Asia And Africa

A fundamental change in orientation for all international aid programs to Asian and African nations, shifting the emphasis from development of inanimate resources to development of manpower through educational programs, was called for by Abba Eban, Israel's Minister of Education and Culture, in an address at Brandeis University, in Waltham, Mass. Speaking before approximately 1,500 residents of the Greater Boston area, in the University's Shapiro Athletic Center, the former Israel Ambassador to the United States and the United Nations said: "It is better that the resources of an African State be developed under African planning and management in ten years than that they should be developed under the leadership of non-African officials and technicians now. The oil, the minerals, the water and other resources of Asia and Africa will not run away. The urgent task is to ensure that Asians and Africans be given access to their own resources, from which they are now debarred through a lack of momentum in the educational movement."

Mr. Eban said, after his address, that he proposed to advocate his ideas on this point in talks with high officials at the United Nations and in Washington before his departure for Israel. The Israel statesman made his remarks in giving the annual Louis Dembitz Brandeis lecture as part of Brandeis University's current adult education series. The greatest attendance yet recorded at the Brandeis lectures greeted his talk, "Israel In The Era Of New States," with a warm and prolonged ovation. Dr. Abram L. Sachar, Brandeis president, introduced Mr. Eban and monitored the question and answer period which followed the address.

Mr. Eban continued: "In addition to international programs for the furtherance of industry and agriculture, there should be a 'crash program' for the furtherance of secondary and higher education in the awakening continents. Otherwise, the nations that were hitherto dependent on the officials of colonial powers will be indefinitely dependent, despite their political sovereignty, on the officials and experts of western governments and of international agencies and foundations.

"True independence and equality," said the Israeli Minister, "must be vindicated, first of all, in the domain of knowledge. Nothing has been achieved in Europe and America of which Asia and Africa are not intrinsically capable. The trouble is that one part of humanity, in Asia and Africa, has been cut off from contact with the processes of thought and action which have endowed another part of humanity, in Europe and America, with the elements of its power."

In discussing Israel's role in the development of new states, Mr. Eban referred to his own reunion with the American people, and especially American Jewry, amongst whom he labored as Israel's messenger for eleven years. "They were heroic years. There was heroism in the depth of the Jewish agony. There was heroism also in the speed and scope of our recuperation. Those years were tense with effort; electrified by great choices; enriched by responsibility; illuminated by sacrifice. For you, and for me, in your midst, they were unforgettable years. And now, we are no longer among the youngest of the nations. The dawn has passed. The morning is over. And the question is whether the heroic age is behind us; whether normality, with all its limitations, is now to be our lot; whether Jewish life must now be lived in a lower key after the thunder and music of the first decade. I regret this assumption with all the passion of my heart. I deny it with every conviction of heart. The coming years, too, can be heroic. It will not be a prosaic era unless we condemn ourselves to small issues and small ideas."

Mr. Eban described the position of leaders of newly liberated nations "who find themselves charged with responsibilities at once formidable and inspiring. Their eyes fall in expectation and wonder on the contemporary scientific movement with its record of immensurable triumphs and even more radiant promise for future years." He expressed confidence that "despite occasional setbacks arising from Arab pressure, the relations of Israel with other new States would continue to develop in communion and trust."

Analyzing Israel's position in the world, Mr. Eban described Israel as "living in three worlds extending beyond her frontiers. She is part of the Jewish people; of the democratic family of nations; and of the society of new states emerging to independence. The circumstance of belonging to these three worlds dominates Israel's international relations and determines her intellectual vocation. She has three dimensions which expand the scope of her influence beyond her territorial limits, thus rescuing her from provincialism. We should not confuse stature with size. A nation can be small of size and universal in stature."

trying to help, to try to understand "how a human being could possibly fence himself in boundless hatred," and how this could apparently increase with the passing of time.

"There is a maxim in our sacred book saying, 'What one has, one increases; and if one has little, the little is taken away from him.' This is perhaps how one could understand this demonic hatred which was ever soaring in him."

He himself was arrested toward the end of 1940 without even being brought in for questioning. He said he was "simply sent to a concentration camp, a place called Camp De Gurs, which had been used mainly for Spanish Communist civil-war prisoners." Soon afterwards he was transferred to Sachsenhausen concentration camp, which now lies in East Germany.

He was asked how he was treated there, and he answered: "Honourable court, may I be permitted not to go into detail about my sufferings at the Sachsenhausen camp? The wounds of the heart are more serious than the wounds of the lips."

Eichmann, sitting in his tilted-back chair with head-erect posture, just stared at the cleric with his twisted compression of lips.

Dean Grueber told a little about the sufferings of the Jews under "the sadistic S.S. men" — how they were made to roll in the snow for the edification of drunken guards and then were put into unheated, freezing-cold huts to die of pneumonia later, says the New York Herald Tribune. He summed it up this way:

"It is absolutely impossible to imagine what happened because there was cruelty where there were no witnesses — no witnesses to things that happened in the bunkers, no witnesses to people buried alive. But perhaps they will speak in the Last Judgment; here their voices cannot be heard."

He said he left Sachsenhausen camp in October, 1941, and was sent to Dachau camp near Munich where he was in the company of 700 other clergymen in a special camp.The cleric described in some detail the selection of inmates for extermination, saying that a committee of so-called experts would "earmark" 300 or more persons at a time, mostly invalids. These would then be shipped out to an extermination camp. Any kind of sickness was a nightmare, for it meant that the sick person might be sent off to be gassed. This actually happened to a close friend of his who had a swollen neck.

In total contrast to the dean was thirty-eight-year old Mrs. Charlotte Salzberger, wife of a Jewish physician, whose sharp, intelligent features held a little disquieting smile as she gazed at Eichmann and told the judges that he once warned her as a prisoner that if she said anything about the experiences she had undergone, something fearful would happen to her.

He used an expression, she said, glancing with her little smile across the chamber to Eichmann in his glass box: "You will be put through the chimneys."

The woman's smile seemed more one of wonderment over the fates that had brought her and Eichmann into this courtroom than a smile of vengefulness. She was being transferred from the women's concentration camp of Ravensbruck in Germany, where she had learned extermination secrets that made her a dangerous prisoner, at that particular time when Eichmann interviewed her, she said.

Mrs. Salzberger was living in Holland when she was sent to the concentration camp of Ravensbruck, where 50,000 women were confined, says the New York Herald Tribune. She described the life in the camp and the brutality there, and told how, when the Allied armies began advancing, the camp became overcrowded with transports from prisons near the front.

She testified that extermination facilities were built at the camp in 1944, and it was her knowledge of this that appeared to cause a hitch when she was being evacuated to the smaller camp of Theresienstadt.

The witness testified that she and her sister and some others were held in a room for several weeks outside that camp. They finally realized it was because of the suspicions of the Nazis that they knew too much about the extermination facilities at Ravensbruck. Finally, a group of Nazi officers came to interview them, and she identified Eichmann as one of them.

He was the officer who finally told her and the others that they could enter Theresienstadt, but if they said anything indiscreet they would go up the chimney, she said.

At a later session in the trial a survivor of the Maidanek camp near Lublin, Poland, where at least 200,000 Jews were destroyed by the Nazis, told of having watched a parade of naked Jews led to the gas chambers.

In a voice burdened with horror and disgust, the witness, Israel Gutman, said he had heard the sound of shuffling in the camp street, one day in 1943 as he lay recovering from pneumonia. He staggered to the window and looked out.

"I saw lines of naked people marching," he said. "Among them was a little boy. He could not have been more than ten, and he was holding a smaller child in his arms. I saw two S.S. (Elite Guard) men looking at this scene and laughing."

Mr. Gutman's dark eyes blazed behind thick-lensed glasses. He spoke in agitated, strident tones. He said he had often stolen a glance at the S.S. men — "a direct gaze was too dangerous" — to see if they possessed "a spark of humanity."

He concluded they did not, says the New York Times. "I always met the same gaze. When we were sad they were happy. When they tortured us they laughed. They were drunk with blood."

Maidanek was the camp where, according to Attorney General Gideon Hausner, children were given candy as they entered the gas chambers.

It was also a place where, Mr. Gutman testified, prisoners were forced to run to the latrines at 4:30 o'clock each morning. Those who lagged, he said, were beaten with whips by "kapos," Jewish and non-Jewish criminals who had favored status.

The witness said he was brought to Maidanek after the collapse of the Warsaw Ghetto uprising in May, 1943. The S.S. men, he said, screamed at the prisoners and whipped them as they marched from the Lublin station to Maidanek.

There they were ordered to lie on the ground for hours, Mr. Gutman said, and finally the "selection" took place, during which the physically fit prisoners were spared and all others sent to the gas chambers. Mr. Gutman was marked for survival and sent to a shed to have his head shaved.

The camp was divided into five units called "fields," the witness recalled. Mr. Gutman was put in Field No. 4, which consisted of a parade ground for roll-calls surrounded by verminous huts each containing 800 prisoners. The huts were so crowded that the prisoners slept two to a bunk in three tiers of bunks.

Mr. Gutman was later transferred to the Auschwitz death camp, where he recalled the brief desperate mutiny of prisoners in the fall of 1944, when some of the death installations were blown up, killing some S. S. men.

The explosives were smuggled to the prisoners by Jewish girls working in a munitions factory. The witness said that four of the girls had been hanged publicly.

Mr. Hausner presented two documents showing the drastic change in Heinrich Himmler's handling of the Jewish problem when it became evident that the Nazis were losing the war. Himmler was head of the S. S.

Mr. Hausner, assuming the harsh voice of a Nazi officer, read parts of Himmler's speech to S. S. leaders in Poznan, October 4, 1943, in which Himmler said: "I want to speak to you quite frankly on a very grave matter * * * the extermination of the Jews."

Himmler complained that while members of the Nazi party accepted the necessity of Jewish annihilation, each of the 80,000,000 Germans knew a "decent Jew" whom he wanted saved, says the New York Times. He called on the S. S. leaders to "ignore these human foibles" and obey the orders for genocide. Those who could not obey because of "weakness" would be pensioned off, Himmler said.

The other document presented by Mr. Hausner showed that Himmler sounded quite differently in the closing months of the war. He read a letter by Himmler to a Swedish friend dated March 21, 1944, in which Himmler deplored the "folly" of wartime demagoguery that had forced a halt to emigration of Jews from German-occupied parts of Europe.

Himmler said he had revived this "blessed" emigration by sending 2,700 Jews to Switzerland, Mr. Hausner commented.

Eichmann, contended by his police interrogation that he was only a small fry obliged to follow orders and that any refusal on his part to ship Jews to concentration camps would have meant his being shot.
